MONDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 1, 1858.

BRYANT SKETCHES THE SPANIARDS. One of the first places we were taken to see on our arrival at Madrid was the Prado. Here, beyond the pavements, and yet within the gates of the capital, is a spacious pleasure-ground, formed into long alleys by rows of trees, extending north and south almost out of sight. In the midst, between the colossal figure of white marble, which form the fountain of Cybele, on the north, to those of the fountain of Neptune, in the ther direction, is an area of ten or twelve acres, beaten as hard and smooth as a threshing-floor, by ality of the Missouri Compromise Act, &c., by the feet of those who daily frequent it. Into this, two noble streets, the finest in Madrid, widening as they approach it, the Calle de Alcala and the Calle de Atocha, pour every alternoon, in fine weather, at this season, a dense throng of well-dressed people of the capital, to walk up and down, till the twilight warns them home. They move with a leisurely pace from the lions of Cybele to the sea-monsters of Neptune, and then turning, measure the ground over and over again, till the proper number of hours is consumed .-The men are unexceptionably dressed, with picely brushed hats, glittering boots and fresh gloves-the favorite color of their kids is vellow: the ladies are mostly in black, with the black veil of the country resting on their shoulders; they wear the broadest possible hoops, and skirts that trail in the dust, and they move with a certain easy dignity, which is thought to be peculiar to the nation. On these occasions, a dress of light color is a singularity, and a bonnet attracts observation. Close to the walk is the promenade for carriages, which pass slowly over the ground, up one side and down the other, till those who sit in them are tired. Here are to be seen the showy liveries of the grandees and opulent hidalgoes of Spain, and of the foreign ambassadors. It seemed to me that the place was thronged on the day that I first saw it, but this the Spanish gentleman who conducted us absolutely denied. "There is nobody here," said he, "nobody at all. The weather is chilly, and the sky threatening; you should come in fine weather." The hotel in a torrent of rain. The public walk is one of the social institutions of the Spanish towns; it is a universal polite assembly; to which you come without the formality of an invitation, and from which nobody is excluded; all are welcome under the same hospitable roof, the sky. Here acquaintances are almost sure to meet; here new acquaintances are formed; here the Bayard Taylor, price $1 25. events of the day are discussed-its news, politics and scandal; here the last fashions are exhibited; here flirtations are carried on, Richardson, M. D., price only 50c., or $3 per and matches, I suppose, made. The Span- annum. iards everywhere pass a great deal of their time in the streets, and seem to have no idea of coming together to eat and drink. When you have a letter of introduction to a Spanpard, he does not invite you to dinner; but when he tells you that his house is yours, he means to give you free access to it at all proper hours. I can testify that the Spaniards are hospitable in the sense of giving you their society, and making your stay in their country pleasant, though it is not their habit to feast you. They place you on the common footing of Spanish society, except that, regarding you as a stranger, they study your convenience the more.

ceremonious terms with each other, dropping in at each other's houses in the evening, and calling each other by their Christian names, get, perhaps, if anything, a cup of tea or chocolate, and a biscocho. I was several times at "Startling Questions," &c., in 2 vols, Matthew the house of a literary lady of Madrid, and and Mark, price $1 each. saw there some af the most eminent men of thors, leaders of the liberal party, and chiefs | vember, 1856, to February, 1857, $1. of the absolutists-who came and went with almost as little ceremony as if they met | Macduff, author of "Morning and Night Watchon the Prado. The turtulia is something es," &c., $1. Just published and for sale by more than this-there is more dress, illumination, numbers; but the refreshments are almost as frugally dispensed. The strange in Spain does not find himself excluded from native society, as he does in Italy, but is at once introduced to it on the same footing with | $1

I find one objection, however, to the social arrangements of Madrid; that they make the evenings so frightfully long. People begin to call on each other after nine o'clock, and when the theatres close, between eleven and twelve, the number of calls increases, and these visitors remain until some time smong the short hours beyond midnight --The example of turning day into night is set by the Court. The Queen does not dine till ten o'clock in the evening. When I first came to Madrid, I used almost every day, a little after sunset, to hear the clattering of horses' feet on the pavement, and the cry of la reina, la reina! and, looking out at my window saw three showy carriages pass, preceded by a small body of cavalry with drawn swords, and followed by another. It was the Queen, taking her early drive. This was her morning, and she was taking the morning air at six o'clock in the atternoon on her way to church. As the days grew shorter, the carriages passed after the lamps were
